Robert Blatt

, until the day and night come to an end.
organ, weights, people, and a day

In you, O my mind, I measure times. Do not overwhelm me with your clamour.
—Augustine of Hippo, Confessions

performance

The work is specific to its time, date, and place of realization: sunrise to sunrise, 06:47 7 September 2019 to 06:49 8 September 2019, at Hospitalkirche, Stuttgart. It was written for the organ at Hospitalkirche and is performed by a group of musicians who alternate playing the organ throughout the day.

In theory, the work may be realized at different times/dates/locations; however, the score will need to be rewritten to track the movement of the sun in its new orientation and mapped to the idiosyncrasies of a different organ. This is accomplished through the expansion and contraction of tonal ranges that are interpolated between the times of and median times between sunrise, solar noon, sunset, solar midnight, and sunrise again.

materials

Weights, as many as possible, sized and of the necessary mass to hold down individual keys of the keyboards.

Small, flat sticks of wood or similar, at least a few, sized to fit within the gap between the top of individual pedals of the pedalboard and its felt damper at the base of the organ to keep the pedal note from releasing and therefore continuously sounding.

score

The score contains seven vertical columns designating available pitches, keyboards, pedalboard, and stops of the organ that may sound within a particular period of time connected to the current time of day. Each horizontal column designates one such period of time, from the time notated in the first vertical column until the time notated in the same vertical yet subsequent horizontal column. The second and third vertical columns use Helmholtz pitch notation to designate the range of available pitches that may sound. The fourth through seventh vertical columns designate both the available keyboards and pedalboard that may sound (their availability notated with one or more numbers and their unavailability with a hyphen) and the particular stops that may be used (notated numbers correspond to stop numbers found on the organ's console).

To perform the score, one simply adds or removes a weight or stop according to those that are designated available at the current time of day, then pauses to listen for some varying attentive duration of time, then likewise adds or removes another weight or stop and again pauses to listen—continuing unrushed in this manner.

From the start until the end of the day, at least one note/stop of the organ should sound.
